sárasvatī f. (of sárasvat, q.v. under sáras) a region abounding in pools and lakes MBh. i, 7745
• N. of a river (celebrated in RV. and held to be a goddess whose identity is much disputed
• most authorities hold that the name Sárasvatī is identical with the Avestan Haraquaiti river in Afghanistan, but that it usually means the Indus in the RV., and only occasionally the small sacred rivers in Madhya-deśa see below
• the river-goddess has seven sisters and is herself sevenfold, she is called the mother of streams, the best of mothers, of rivers, and of goddesses
• the Ṛishis always recognize the connection of the goddess with the river, and invoke her to descend from the sky, to bestow vitality, renown, and riches
• elsewhere she is described as moving along a golden path and as destroying Vṛitra &c
• as a goddess she is often connected with other deities, e.g. with Pūshan, Indra, the Maruts and the Aśvins [Page 1182, Column 3]
• in the Āpri hymns she forms a triad with the sacrificial goddesses Iḍā and Bhātrati
• accord. to a myth told in the VS. xix, 12, SṭSárasvatī through speech [vācā] communicated vigour to Indra
• in the BrṢmaṇas she is identified with vāc, 'Speech', and in later times becomes goddess of eloquence, See below) RV. &c. &c
• N. of a well-known small river (held very sacred by the Hindūs

• the Saṃhitā of the Sāma-veda consists of two parts

• the first, called Arcika or Purviccika or Chando-grantha, contains 585 verses disjoined from their proper sequence in the Ṛig-veda and arranged in 59 Daśatis or decades, which again are subdivided into Prapāṭhakas and Ardha-prapāṭhakas
• the second, called Uttarârcika or Uttarā-grantha, contains 1225 verses, also chiefly from the Ṛik-saṃhitā, but less disjointed than in the first part, and arranged in nine Prapāhakas with Ardha-prapāṭhakas, mostly, however, grouped in triplets
• the directions for the formation of Sāmans or chants out of these verses are carefully laid down in the Gānas or manuals for chanting, two of which, viz. the Geya-gāna and Āraṇya-g, are a directory for the Ārcika portion, and two, viz. Ūha-gṭgāna and Ūhya-gāna, for the Uttarârcikā
• in Mn. i, 23 the Sāma-veda is described as drawn forth from the sun
• in iv, 124 it is described as having a special reference to the Pitṛis or deceased ancestors, and its sound is therefore said to possess a kind of impurity, whereas the Ṛig-veda has the gods for his objects and the Yajurveda men
